Second, you knew about this from the beginning. Contemporary criticism of the 'pluricentric' model partly arises from historical considerations - that, while there is national variation in spoken rather than written German, linguistic differences may be ephemeral and are not very significant, and some of the Austrian and Swiss distinctive features are also represented in South Germany. The national standard varieties of these countries are, in fact, often devalued and assigned according to the historical classification of the base dialects to 'South German regional dialects' oberdeutsche Mundarten or Bavarian and Alemannic dialects respectively e.
